The Genesis of a Revolution: Persepolis I

Persepolis I throws us headfirst into the vibrant, yet increasingly stifled, world of Marji (Marjane) in Tehran. We see her as a precocious, imaginative child, the daughter of fiercely intellectual and politically active parents. Her childhood is initially filled with dreams of becoming a prophet, imagining a more just and equitable world, and engaging in lively debates with her loving grandmother. This idyllic beginning, however, is soon overshadowed by the rumblings of revolution.

Childhood Under the Shadow of Change

Satrapı masterfully uses her distinctive black-and-white illustrations to convey the shift in atmosphere. The early pages are filled with a youthful exuberance, but as the political climate deteriorates, the stark contrasts of black and white become more pronounced, mirroring the starker realities Marji begins to face. We witness the growing protests against the Shah and the eventual triumph of the Islamic Revolution in 1979. The narrative doesn't shy away from the complexities of this period. Marji's parents are involved in the resistance, and she hears whispers of political dissent, her understanding of which is filtered through a child's innocent yet perceptive gaze. She grapples with the idea of good versus evil, often personifying them in her own imaginative world. The ban on Western music and the increasing restrictions on personal freedoms are presented not just as political decrees, but as tangible disruptions to a young girl's life.

Family as a Haven and a Source of Strength

Central to Persepolis I is the unwavering love and support Marji receives from her family. Her parents, Fereydoun and Taji, are educated, liberal thinkers who refuse to cower under the new regime. They encourage Marji's curiosity and independent thinking, even when it puts them at risk. Her father, an engineer, and her mother, a teacher, are instrumental in shaping Marji's understanding of the world, providing her with a safe space for questioning and growth. Her grandmother, a wise and formidable woman, stands out as a particularly beloved character. Her pragmatism, her love for life, and her unwavering moral compass offer Marji guidance and comfort. The scenes with her grandmother, like learning about the importance of honesty and self-respect, are deeply touching and serve as a powerful reminder of the enduring strength of familial bonds.

The Dawn of Islamic Rule and the Erosion of Freedom

As the Islamic Republic takes hold, the changes become more drastic and immediate. The imposition of the veil is a pivotal moment, symbolizing the loss of personal autonomy and the stark visual representation of the new order. Marji's initial resistance to wearing the veil, her defiance in school, and her parents' efforts to navigate these new rules paint a vivid picture of daily life under authoritarianism. Satrapi captures the fear and uncertainty that permeates society. The rise of the Guardians of the Revolution, the crackdown on dissent, and the Iran-Iraq War cast a long shadow. Marji witnesses public executions, the bombing of her city, and the constant threat of violence. Despite these harrowing experiences, her spirit remains unbroken, fueled by her parents' courage and her own inherent resilience.

Navigating Exile and Identity: Persepolis II

Persepolis II picks up where the first volume left off, following Marji's adolescence and young adulthood as her family makes the difficult decision to send her to Vienna, Austria, for her safety and education. This transition marks a significant turning point, as Marji is thrust into a new culture, grappling with feelings of displacement, loneliness, and the complex process of forming her identity in a foreign land.

The Challenges of a Double Life

In Vienna, Marji experiences the freedoms she was denied in Iran, but also the prejudices and misunderstandings that come with being an outsider. She navigates the world of European schools, tries to make friends, and experiences her first romantic relationships. However, she also struggles with a sense of alienation, a feeling of not truly belonging anywhere. Satrapi vividly portrays Marji's internal conflict. While she enjoys the relative freedom, she also feels a pang of guilt and longing for her family and her homeland. She witnesses the cultural clashes and stereotypes that people from the West hold about the Middle East, which often feel simplistic and inaccurate. Her experiences highlight the difficulties of assimilation and the constant negotiation of one's identity when caught between two worlds.

Rebellion and Self-Discovery in Europe

Marji's time in Vienna is a period of intense self-discovery, marked by both rebellion and vulnerability. She experiments with different subcultures, explores her sexuality, and grapples with depression and disillusionment. The narrative doesn't romanticize her experiences; instead, it presents a raw and honest portrayal of a young woman trying to find her place in the world. Her journey in Europe is also characterized by a longing for connection. She seeks solace in friendships, romantic relationships, and artistic expression. However, these connections are often fleeting, leaving her feeling more isolated. The stark contrast between the superficiality she sometimes encounters in the West and the deep emotional connections she had in Iran further complicates her feelings.

The Pull of Home and the Burden of Memory

Despite her attempts to build a life in Europe, Marji is constantly drawn back to Iran, both physically and emotionally. Her parents, who remain in Iran, face increasing hardship and danger. The letters and phone calls between them are filled with a mixture of love, concern, and unspoken fears. Ultimately, Marji decides to return to Iran to be with her family and to reconnect with her roots. This decision, though fraught with danger, underscores her deep connection to her homeland and her desire to understand her own cultural identity more fully. The experiences she has gained in the West, while challenging, have also given her a broader perspective and a stronger sense of self.
