

Why Women Stay In Emotionally Abusive Relationships

Understanding the Complexities of Staying in Emotionally Abusive Relationships The societal narrative often portrays women as victims, leaving abusive relationships swiftly. However, the reality is far more nuanced. Why do women – seemingly strong and capable individuals – remain in emotionally abusive relationships? This delves into the multifaceted reasons behind this complex behavior, exploring the psychological, social, and practical factors that contribute to a woman's decision-making within this challenging context. We will examine the subtle traps of emotional abuse, the fear-based dynamics at play, and the strategies for breaking free.

The Deep Roots of Staying: A Psychological Perspective

Understanding the psychological factors influencing a woman's decision to stay in an emotionally abusive relationship requires acknowledging the profound impact of manipulation and control. Emotional abuse often involves subtle, insidious tactics that erode a woman's self-esteem and sense of self-worth. This creates a vicious cycle where the abuser's words and actions chip away at her confidence, making her doubt her own judgment.

Learned Helplessness and Powerlessness

One key factor is the development of learned helplessness. Over time, the woman may perceive herself as powerless to change the situation, a feeling often fostered by the abuser's consistent devaluation and control. Studies have shown that individuals who experience prolonged periods of abuse and lack of agency can develop a sense of hopelessness, leading them to believe that escape is impossible. This can be particularly true in relationships where the abuse is subtle and insidious, making it difficult to recognize as abusive.

Fear and Safety Concerns

Fear is a dominant force in abusive relationships. This fear isn't always about physical violence; it can stem from emotional intimidation, threats, or the perceived consequences of leaving. The abuser may threaten to harm themselves, the children, or even isolate the woman from support systems. This climate of fear can significantly limit her options and make the prospect of leaving daunting.

Low Self-Esteem and Self-Doubt

Women who have experienced emotional abuse often suffer from low self-esteem. The constant criticism, belittling, and manipulation undermine their sense of self-worth, making them question their own judgment and value. This internalized self-doubt creates a belief system that validates the abuser's behavior and makes leaving seem even more perilous.

Trauma Bond and Attachment

The trauma bond is a phenomenon where victims form an emotional attachment to their abusers, despite the abuse. This bond arises from the complex interplay of fear, dependence, and fleeting moments of connection amidst the abuse. The abuser may offer fleeting moments of affection or attention, reinforcing this attachment and making detachment extremely difficult. This connection, however distorted, becomes deeply ingrained.

Social and Financial Dependence

In some cases, social and financial dependence on the abuser can significantly contribute to a woman's decision to stay. This may include dependence on the abuser for financial support, fear of social isolation, or lack of access to alternative resources. These factors can make leaving a seemingly daunting prospect.

Practical Barriers to Leaving

Beyond the psychological factors, there are often significant practical obstacles that hinder a woman's ability to leave an abusive relationship.

Lack of Financial Resources

A crucial barrier is the lack of financial independence. In many cases, the woman may rely on her partner for financial support, making it difficult to establish herself financially after leaving. This lack of independence can trap her in the relationship.

Lack of Support Networks

Limited support networks can also hinder a woman's ability to leave. She may be isolated from friends and family or feel judged for staying, increasing her sense of loneliness and vulnerability. This lack of social support significantly impacts the emotional strength needed to navigate the challenges of separation.

Fear of the Unknown Future

The unknown future often looms large in a woman's mind when considering leaving an abusive relationship. She may fear facing new challenges, finding a new home, or starting over. The fear of the unknown can be a powerful deterrent, overshadowing the potential for a better life.

Children and Family Obligations

For women with children, the emotional and practical implications of leaving are often magnified. The fear of jeopardizing her children's well-being, or concerns about their future care, can be a significant obstacle to leaving.

Case Studies and Real-Life Examples

While generalizing is dangerous, real-life accounts offer glimpses into the complexities of this issue. A 2018 study highlighted that many women reported feeling trapped by a combination of fear, financial instability, and lack of support networks. Anecdotal evidence suggests that women who have experienced childhood trauma are disproportionately vulnerable to staying in abusive relationships. These women may struggle with similar attachment patterns. [NOTE: Due to the sensitive nature of this subject, detailed case studies need to be crafted with ethical considerations. This section would require careful consideration of anonymity and individual experiences for accuracy and ethical research practices. I can't provide case studies without further detailed research data. You would need to integrate this section with a relevant research study.]

Breaking Free: The Path to Healing and Empowerment

Recognizing the complexity of staying in abusive relationships is the first crucial step. Support systems, including therapists, domestic violence shelters, and support groups, play a pivotal role in helping women navigate their options. Strategies for self-empowerment include building a support network, seeking therapy for emotional healing, and creating a safety plan. [NOTE: A table summarizing helpful resources for victims of domestic violence is appropriate here.]

Conclusion

The decision to stay in an emotionally abusive relationship is rarely a simple one. It's a complex interplay of psychological factors, social pressures, and practical constraints. Understanding these dynamics is crucial to supporting women who are struggling and enabling them to break free. By providing resources, creating safe spaces, and offering emotional support, we can empower women to find the strength and courage they need to embark on a journey towards a safer and healthier future.

The Invisible Chains: Why Women Stay in Emotionally Abusive Relationships

It's a question that can be both perplexing and deeply frustrating to outsiders: why do women stay in emotionally abusive relationships? When we see the signs – the constant criticism, the manipulation, the isolation, the erosion of self-worth – it seems obvious that the only logical step is to leave. Yet, the reality for many women trapped in these dynamics is far more complex, entangled in a web of psychological, emotional, and sometimes even practical barriers. This isn't a matter of weakness or poor judgment; it's a testament to the insidious nature of emotional abuse and the powerful hold it can exert. Emotional abuse, unlike physical abuse, leaves no visible bruises. It's a slow drip of negativity, a subtle undermining of a person's reality and self-esteem. It's a masterclass in psychological warfare, and breaking free requires understanding the profound reasons why women find themselves unable to sever these damaging ties.

The Cycle of Abuse: A Lullaby of False

Hope

One of the most significant factors keeping women in emotionally abusive relationships is the cyclical nature of this abuse. It's not a constant state of torment; rather, it's characterized by periods of abuse followed by what's often called the "honeymoon phase" or the "reconciliation phase." During the abuse phase, the abuser might engage in intense criticism, devaluation, or controlling behaviors. This can leave the victim feeling battered, confused, and utterly drained.

However, inevitably, this is followed by a period where the abuser becomes loving, apologetic, and attentive. They might shower the victim with gifts, express deep remorse, and promise to change. This phase is incredibly disorienting for the victim. It offers a glimpse of the partner they fell in love with, a sliver of hope that things can get better. This manufactured kindness acts like a powerful drug, creating a temporary reprieve from the pain and reinforcing the idea that the relationship is worth fighting for. This cycle, often referred to as the battered woman syndrome (though its applicability extends beyond physical abuse), creates a powerful psychological trap. Each time the cycle repeats, the victim's hope is renewed, making it harder to recognize the overall pattern and the futility of change. They begin to internalize the abuser's narrative, believing that they are the problem or that the good times will eventually outweigh the bad.

Erosion of Self-Esteem: The Foundation Crumbles

Emotional abuse is designed to dismantle a person's sense of self. The constant criticism, gaslighting, and belittling chip away at their confidence, their judgment, and their belief in their own worth. An abuser will often target a woman's core insecurities, magnifying her flaws and making her feel inadequate in every aspect of her life – her appearance, her intelligence, her mothering skills, her career. When your self-esteem has been systematically eroded, it becomes incredibly difficult to believe you deserve better. You start to internalize the abuser's negative messages, thinking, "Maybe I am too sensitive," "Maybe I am asking for too much," or "No one else would put up with me." This makes the thought of leaving, and facing the world alone, terrifying. How can you start over when you feel like you have nothing to offer? This feeling of worthlessness can be amplified by isolation. Emotional abusers often try to control their partner's social life, alienating them from friends and family. This leaves the victim with a limited support system, further reinforcing their dependence on the abuser and making it harder to gain an objective perspective.

Fear: The Ever-Present Shadow

Fear is a powerful motivator, and in emotionally abusive relationships, it takes many insidious forms.

Fear of Retaliation and Escalation

While emotional abuse may not involve physical violence, there's often an underlying threat of escalation. The abuser might make veiled threats, imply consequences for leaving, or exhibit intimidating behavior that instills fear. Women may worry that leaving will provoke a more aggressive response, either towards them, their children, or even their loved ones.

Fear of Being Alone

After years of emotional abuse, a woman's sense of independence can be severely diminished. The abuser has often created a situation where the woman feels incapable of managing on her own. This can lead to an overwhelming fear of being alone, both practically and emotionally. They might worry about financial instability, managing household responsibilities, or simply facing the world without the familiar (albeit painful) presence of their abuser.

Fear of Not Being Believed or Judged

Society still holds a great deal of stigma around domestic abuse, and women who experience emotional abuse can fear that their experiences won't be taken seriously. They might worry about being blamed, judged as weak, or told they are overreacting. This fear of disbelief can prevent them from seeking help or confiding in others, further isolating them.

The Role of Manipulation and Gaslighting

Emotional abusers are masters of manipulation. They twist words, distort reality, and make their victim question their sanity. This is commonly known as gaslighting. Gaslighting involves denying or distorting the victim's reality. For example, an abuser might deny saying something they clearly said, blame the victim for things they didn't do, or accuse them of being too emotional or crazy for remembering events differently. Over time, this constant barrage of denial and distortion erodes the victim's ability to trust their own perceptions and memories. They begin to doubt their own sanity, making it incredibly difficult to recognize the abuse for what it is. They may start to believe the abuser's version of reality, even when it contradicts their own experiences. This manipulation extends to creating dependency. The abuser might control finances, isolate the victim from their support network, or make them feel like they are incapable of functioning without them. This creates a situation where leaving feels like a death sentence, both emotionally and practically.

Love and Attachment: The Lingering Hope

It's crucial to remember that emotional abuse rarely starts immediately. Often, relationships begin with genuine love, affection, and shared dreams. The abuser is skilled at presenting their best self in the beginning, luring their partner into a deep emotional bond. This initial love and attachment create a strong foundation that is difficult to break, even when the abuse begins. Women may hold onto the memories of those good times, believing that the person they fell in love with is still in there somewhere. They may feel a sense of obligation to "fix" the relationship or to stay for the sake of the children. This trauma bonding is a powerful psychological phenomenon where the victim develops an unhealthy attachment to their abuser due to the intermittent reward and punishment cycle. The intense emotional highs and lows create a strong bond that can be even more addictive than healthy love.

Practical Barriers to Leaving

Beyond the psychological and emotional entanglements, practical barriers can also play a significant role in a woman's inability to leave an emotionally abusive relationship.

Financial Dependence

In many relationships, one partner has more financial control. If a woman has been systematically denied access to funds, discouraged from working, or made to believe she's incapable of earning a living, leaving can feel financially impossible. The prospect of homelessness, inability to provide for children, or simply not being able to meet basic needs can be a paralyzing fear.

Children as Leverage

For women with children, the decision to leave becomes exponentially more complicated. Abusers often use children as a tool of manipulation and control, threatening to take them away, alienating them from the other parent, or using them to guilt-trip the mother. The fear of disrupting their children's lives, of them being separated from their father, or of facing single parenthood can be an overwhelming deterrent.

Lack of Housing and Support

Finding safe and affordable housing is a significant challenge for many, and even more so for someone trying to escape an abusive situation. Without a readily available support network of friends or family willing and able to offer shelter, the prospect of leaving can seem insurmountable.

Societal Pressures and Stigma

Despite progress, societal expectations and stigma can still influence a woman's decision. There can be pressure to maintain appearances, to keep the family unit intact, or to avoid the perceived shame of divorce or separation. This can create a sense of obligation to stay, even when the relationship is deeply unhealthy.

Understanding is Key to Support

Recognizing why women stay in emotionally abusive relationships is not about judgment; it's about understanding. It's about acknowledging the immense courage it takes to even contemplate leaving, and the long, arduous journey of healing that follows. It requires empathy and a commitment to providing support without conditions or judgment. If you or someone you know is struggling in an emotionally abusive relationship, remember that you are not alone, and there is help available. Reaching out to a domestic violence hotline, a therapist, or a trusted friend can be the first step towards reclaiming your life and your sense of self. Breaking free from these invisible chains is possible, and with the right support, healing and a brighter future are within reach. Understanding the complex web of reasons is the first step towards empowering survivors and fostering a society that truly supports those who have experienced this insidious form of abuse.

Understanding Why Women Stay in Emotionally Abusive Relationships Emotional abuse is a silent yet deeply damaging force that erodes self-worth, distorts perception, and traps individuals in cycles of pain. Women often remain in such relationships not because they lack the strength to leave, but due to a complex interplay of psychological, social, and emotional factors that make departure feel impossibly daunting. While the immediate signs of abuse—yelling, isolation, humiliation—are visible, the deeper roots lie in how abuse reshapes identity, attachment, and hope.

The Psychological Impact of Emotional Abuse One of the most powerful forces keeping women in emotionally abusive relationships is the psychological manipulation that gradually dismantles self-esteem. Over time, constant criticism, gaslighting, and belittlement chip away at a person's sense of reality and confidence. Victims often internalize the abuser's negative messages, believing they are unworthy, unlovable, or responsible for the conflict. This internalized shame creates a profound fear of being rejected or unlovable again, making the idea of leaving feel not just risky, but terrifying. The abuser may be the only consistent source of emotional validation—even if that validation is twisted and controlling—creating a dependency that is difficult to break. Moreover, emotional abuse frequently disrupts healthy attachment patterns. Many women have grown up in environments where emotional expression was punished or ignored, leaving them unprepared to recognize toxic dynamics or assert boundaries. When abuse enters the picture, it mimics familiar patterns of control, making the relationship feel eerily predictable—even if it's harmful. This paradox—where pain feels more familiar than safety—can trap women in a cycle of repetition, driven less by choice and more by deep-seated conditioning.

Social and Economic Barriers to Leaving Beyond internal struggles, external pressures significantly influence a woman's decision to remain. Emotional abuse often occurs alongside broader systemic inequalities—financial dependence, fear of losing custody of children, or isolation from support networks. In many cases, abusers use threats of economic instability or social ostracization to maintain control, knowing that leaving may mean plunging into uncertainty. For women balancing work, childcare, and caregiving responsibilities, the practical challenges of escaping abuse can feel insurmountable. The stigma surrounding divorce or separation—especially in communities where family honor is prioritized—adds another layer of pressure, discouraging disclosure and action. Additionally, the emotional toll of leaving—grief over lost connection, fear of loneliness, and anxiety about rebuilding—can feel overwhelming. Many women carry the burden of protecting not just themselves but also children, extended family, or pets, making the decision to leave a deeply personal and high-stakes one. The emotional labor of planning, preparing, and coping extends far beyond the moment of departure, underscoring the immense strength required to break free.

Healing, Support, and the Path Forward Recognizing the reasons women stay is essential to offering meaningful support and fostering lasting change. Healing begins with validation—acknowledging that emotional abuse is not a failure of character but a violation of emotional safety. Access to safe, confidential counseling provides crucial space to process trauma, rebuild self-worth, and develop healthy coping strategies. Support groups, both in-person and online, help dismantle isolation by connecting women with others who understand their experiences, reducing the shame that fuels silence.

Legal and social systems must also evolve to meet survivors where they are. Strengthening protections against economic coercion, expanding access to affordable housing and childcare, and improving awareness among healthcare and social service providers can empower women to make safer, more informed choices. Education plays a vital role too—teaching emotional literacy and healthy relationship boundaries from an early age equips future generations to recognize and resist abuse before it begins. Looking ahead, the future holds promise through continued advocacy, policy reform, and compassionate community engagement. As awareness grows and stigma diminishes, more women will feel safe to seek help and more systems will respond with the understanding and resources they need. Breaking the cycle of emotional abuse is not just a personal journey—it is a collective responsibility to build a world where every woman feels seen, supported, and free.

The Unseen Chains: Why Women Stay in Emotionally Abusive Relationships

Emotional abuse is a insidious form of violence, often leaving no visible scars but inflicting deep wounds on a person's psyche. It's a pattern of behavior designed to control, manipulate, and undermine another person's self-worth and autonomy. Yet, the question that often arises, both from those who have never experienced it and even from survivors themselves in moments of clarity, is: "Why do women stay in emotionally abusive relationships?" This question, while seemingly simple, belies a complex web of psychological, social, and situational factors that trap individuals in cycles of pain and distress. Understanding these dynamics is crucial for offering support, fostering healing, and preventing future harm.

The Eroding Foundation: How Emotional Abuse Undermines Self-Worth

At its core, emotional abuse systematically dismantles a victim's sense of self. The abuser's tactics, often subtle at first, are designed to chip away at their partner's confidence, competence, and inherent value. This can include constant criticism, belittling remarks, humiliation, gaslighting, and threats. Over time, these relentless attacks create a deeply ingrained belief in the victim that they are flawed, inadequate, and deserve the mistreatment. This psychological erosion makes it incredibly difficult to envision a life outside the relationship, as the abuser has effectively convinced them that they are incapable of managing on their own or finding someone better. The psychological manipulation involved is profound, leaving victims questioning their own reality and judgment.

Gaslighting: The Art of Making You Doubt Yourself

One of the most potent weapons in an emotional abuser's arsenal is gaslighting. This manipulative tactic involves making the victim question their own memory, perception, and sanity. The abuser will deny events that clearly happened, twist conversations, and accuse the victim of being overly sensitive or delusional. This constant barrage of "you're imagining things" or "that never happened" erodes the victim's trust in their own mind. When your reality is constantly challenged, it becomes easier to accept the abuser's version of events, even when it's demonstrably false. This state of confusion and self-doubt is a significant barrier to recognizing the abuse for what it is and taking action.

Constant Criticism and Belittling: A Slow Poison

Everyday put-downs, sarcastic comments, and overt criticisms, while seemingly minor individually, accumulate to create a devastating impact. The abuser may target the victim's appearance, intelligence, career, friendships, or any aspect of their personality. This consistent barrage of negativity fosters a sense of shame and inadequacy. The victim may begin to internalize these criticisms, believing them to be true. As a result, they may become withdrawn, hesitant to express themselves, and constantly seeking the abuser's approval to avoid further pain. This can lead to a cycle of trying to "fix" oneself to meet the abuser's unrealistic standards, further entrenching their reliance on the abuser's validation, however scarce and conditional it may be.

The Illusion of Love: Attachment and Hope in Abusive Dynamics

It's a common misconception that women in abusive relationships simply "don't love themselves enough" to leave. However, for many, the decision is complicated by a deep-seated attachment to the abuser, fueled by intermittent bursts of affection and promises of change. This pattern is often referred to as the "cycle of abuse," which includes periods of tension building, an abusive incident, reconciliation, and a calm phase.

During the reconciliation phase, the abuser may apologize profusely, shower the victim with gifts and affection, and pledge to never repeat their behavior. This temporary reprieve creates a powerful sense of hope, making the victim believe that the relationship can improve and that the "good times" will return permanently. This is a form of trauma bonding, where the emotional intensity of the abuse, coupled with moments of kindness, creates a strong, albeit unhealthy, emotional connection.

The Trauma Bond: A Twisted Form of Connection

Trauma bonding is a powerful psychological phenomenon where a victim develops an unhealthy attachment to their abuser. This bond is often characterized by extreme highs and lows, where the intense emotional pain of the abuse is interspersed with moments of relief and affection. The brain can become accustomed to this cycle, releasing dopamine and oxytocin during positive interactions, which can create a feeling of intense love and devotion, even in the face of ongoing harm. This bond can be incredibly difficult to break, as it overrides rational thought and fosters a deep emotional dependency on the abuser.

The Hope for Change: Believing the Promises

Many women enter relationships with genuine love and a belief in their partner's potential for good. When abuse begins, they may attribute the behavior to external stressors or temporary issues, clinging to the hope that their partner will revert to their "old self." The abuser often leverages this hope by making sincere-sounding promises of change. These promises, even if insincere, can provide a temporary lifeline, allowing the victim to endure the abuse with the belief that things will eventually improve. This hope can be a powerful inhibitor to leaving, as it offers a vision of a future where the relationship is healthy and loving, a stark contrast to the painful present.

Societal and Environmental Barriers: The External Pressures

Beyond the internal psychological dynamics, numerous external factors can make leaving an emotionally abusive relationship incredibly challenging, if not impossible, for many women. These can include financial dependence, social isolation, fear of judgment, and cultural or religious beliefs that emphasize the sanctity of marriage or family unity above individual well-being.

Financial Dependence: The Golden Handcuffs

Financial control is a common tactic used by abusers to maintain power over their victims. The abuser may limit the victim's access to money, discourage them from working, or control all household finances. This creates a situation where the victim is entirely dependent on the abuser for their basic needs and those of their children. The prospect of financial ruin, homelessness, and the inability to provide for oneself and one's family can be a terrifying deterrent to leaving. The fear of becoming a financial burden or being unable to secure adequate housing and resources can trap women in abusive situations, making the perceived "safety" of staying, however damaging, seem like the only viable option.

Social Isolation and Stigma: The Invisible Walls

Emotional abusers often work to isolate their victims from friends, family, and support networks. They may criticize or forbid contact with loved ones, creating a wedge between the victim and their external support system. This isolation makes it harder for others to recognize the abuse and offer help. Furthermore, societal stigma surrounding domestic abuse, particularly emotional abuse which is often invisible, can prevent women from seeking help. Fear of not being believed, being blamed for the situation, or facing judgment from friends, family, or even authorities can lead to silence and further entrenchment in the abusive relationship. The shame associated with being in an abusive relationship, combined with the abuser's narrative that the victim is somehow at fault, creates an isolating experience.

Cultural and Religious Factors: The Weight of Tradition

In some cultures and religious communities, there is a strong emphasis on preserving family unity and upholding marital vows, often at any cost. This can create immense pressure on women to stay in difficult or abusive relationships, even when their well-being is severely compromised. Divorce may be frowned upon, or religious doctrines might be interpreted to discourage separation. This can leave women feeling trapped by their beliefs and community expectations, with limited options for support or escape. The perceived "sin" of leaving can weigh heavily, overriding the imperative for self-preservation and safety.

The Path to Freedom: Breaking the Chains

Understanding why women stay is not about judgment; it's about empathy and informed support. Recognizing the complex interplay of psychological, social, and environmental factors is the first step towards helping survivors break free. It requires patience, validation, and access to resources that address these multifaceted challenges. Women often need a safe space to heal, rebuild their self-esteem, and gain the practical tools and support necessary to create an independent and fulfilling life. The journey out of an emotionally abusive relationship is often long and arduous, but with understanding and unwavering support, freedom from these unseen chains is achievable.

Questions & Answers About why women stay in emotionally abusive relationships

N o	Question	Answer
1	Why do women often minimize the abuse they experience?	Women may minimize abuse due to a complex interplay of factors like self-blame, the abuser's manipulation (gaslighting), societal conditioning that normalizes certain behaviors, and a desire to maintain a semblance of normalcy or hope for change.

2	Is it true that women choose to stay in abusive relationships out of a lack of options?	While financial dependence or lack of resources can be a significant barrier, 'lack of options' is an oversimplification. It often involves a calculated assessment of risks, fear of retaliation, emotional attachment, societal pressures, and the erosion of self-worth that makes leaving feel impossible.
3	How does the abuser's charm and 'good moments' keep women trapped?	Abusers often employ a cycle of abuse, alternating between cruelty and excessive charm or remorse. These 'good moments' create a sense of hope for change, foster confusion, and can make the victim question their own judgment, making it harder to leave.
4	What role does shame and stigma play in preventing women from leaving?	Shame about being a victim, fear of judgment from others, and societal stigma associated with divorce or being single can create immense pressure to stay. Women may also feel embarrassed that they couldn't 'fix' the relationship or protect themselves.

5	Can children be a reason women stay in emotionally abusive relationships?	Yes, the desire to keep families together for children, the fear of the impact of separation on them, or using children as a tool for control by the abuser can all contribute to a woman staying in an abusive situation.
6	How does an abuser erode a woman's self-esteem, making leaving harder?	Emotional abusers systematically chip away at a woman's self-worth through constant criticism, insults, and humiliation. This erodes her confidence, making her doubt her own abilities, her judgment, and her belief that she deserves better, thus hindering her ability to leave.
7	Is it possible for women to be genuinely in love with their abusive partners?	Yes, it's possible. The abuse often happens within a context of genuine connection and love, especially at the beginning. The abuser's manipulation can also create a false sense of deep intimacy and dependency, making the victim feel 'loved' even when subjected to abuse.

8	What is 'trauma bonding' and how does it explain why women stay?	Trauma bonding is a psychological response where an intense emotional bond forms between an abuser and victim. It's fueled by the cycle of abuse and intermittent reinforcement (good moments), creating a powerful, albeit unhealthy, attachment that can be extremely difficult to break.
9	Why do women often blame themselves for the abuse they endure?	Abusers excel at shifting blame. Through gaslighting and manipulation, they convince the victim that the abuse is her fault, a consequence of her actions or personality. This self-blame, combined with societal messages, can lead women to internalize responsibility.
10	How do societal expectations about relationships influence a woman's decision to stay?
