Jane, offended by his perceived condescension, demands to be seen as his equal.

Significance: This quote is a profound challenge to the rigid social hierarchy of Victorian England. Jane insists that her lack of wealth and status does not diminish her capacity for feeling, intelligence, or love. It's a demand for recognition of her full personhood and a powerful articulation of the inherent equality of all human beings.

The Longing for Belonging: "I desired no longer to be an independent creature."

Significance: This quote demonstrates Jane's unwavering moral integrity. She understands that entering into a marriage with a man who is already wed, even under such extenuating circumstances, would be dishonest and morally wrong. This adherence to principle is what drives her to leave Thornfield.

The Power of Narrative: "Reader, I married him."

These concluding words, found in the final chapter, are among the most famous in English literature. They are simple, direct, and imbued with a profound sense of closure and triumph. Context: After all the trials, tribulations, and moral dilemmas, Jane and Rochester are finally able to marry.
