A high-stakes conversation where a single misplaced word can derail your chances of landing the dream role. What are the verbal landmines you must avoid? This comprehensive guide dives deep into the pitfalls of poor interview communication, providing you with actionable strategies to navigate the treacherous terrain of interview conversations and leave a lasting, positive impression.* Avoiding the Verbal Landmines: A Deep Dive into Taboo Interview Topics Job interviews are not social gatherings. They're assessments, opportunities to showcase your skills and fit within the company culture. Certain topics are best left unaddressed, as they can signal negativity, lack of professionalism, or a poor understanding of the job market and company culture.

Negative or Self-Deprecating Remarks

Common Errors and Their Impact

Constantly downplaying your accomplishments or skills, expressing negativity about previous employers or roles, or complaining about the industry are red flags. These remarks can convey insecurity, a lack of confidence, and an unwillingness to embrace the responsibilities of the position. • Case Study: Sarah, a candidate for a marketing manager position, spent the entire interview lamenting the "terrible management" she experienced at her previous company. She failed to highlight her successful marketing campaigns and instead focused on negativity. She was ultimately not selected. • Example: Instead of saying, "My previous manager was terrible, and I hated the work environment," try, "I learned a lot from my previous experience, especially in terms of [specific skill]. I'm confident I can leverage those skills to achieve [specific company goal]."

Focusing on Salary Expectations Too Early

While salary is a critical aspect of the job offer, discussing it too early in the interview can seem unprofessional and place the focus on your personal gain. • Chart: [Insert a simple chart contrasting early salary discussion (negative perception) with a more strategic approach (positive perception)]

Personal Issues and Negative Experiences

Sharing extensive details about personal issues or negative experiences during the interview can be distracting and unproductive. Keep the focus on your professional achievements and relevant skills. • Example: Instead of, "I've been going through a really tough time lately," try, "I'm focused on my career development and I'm confident in my ability to handle the challenges of this role."

Inappropriate or Irrelevant Conversations

Politics and Controversial Opinions

Expressing strong political opinions or engaging in controversial discussions can create a negative impression and may not align with the company culture. • Example: Avoid statements like, "The current political climate is making things difficult." Instead, focus on your ability to work within any environment.

Excessive Gossip or Negative Remarks about Colleagues

Sharing gossip or negative comments about colleagues or the company (past or present) demonstrates unprofessionalism and a lack of respect.

Off-Topic or Irrelevant Chitchat

Staying on track and answering the questions asked is paramount. Avoid diverting the conversation to unrelated topics. • Table: [Create a table showcasing different irrelevant topics and suitable responses to steer the conversation back on track.]

Language and Tone Errors

Unprofessional Language

Using slang, profanity, or inappropriate language can create a negative first impression and suggest a lack of professionalism.

Passive or Unassertive Responses

Responding passively or not expressing your enthusiasm can show a lack of interest and initiative. Demonstrate your confidence and ambition. • Case Study: David, a candidate for a sales role, responded with "maybe" or "I could" to several key questions. His lack of assertiveness and enthusiasm did not leave a positive impression.

Tone and Body Language

Your tone and body language should project confidence, professionalism, and enthusiasm for the role. Pay attention to how you come across to the interviewer. • Example: Avoid fidgeting, slumped posture, or a monotone voice. Instead, maintain eye contact, a confident posture, and a positive and engaging tone. Advantages of Avoiding these Issues (If any): • Stronger Impression: A focused and professional approach builds trust and credibility. • Professionalism: Demonstrating professionalism significantly enhances your image. • Confidence Boost: Addressing only relevant aspects of your background enhances your self-confidence. • Improved Chances of Selection: A flawless approach enhances your prospects of selection. Conclusion: The job interview is a crucial stepping stone in your career journey. By meticulously avoiding the common verbal landmines and maintaining a professional and positive demeanor, you can elevate your chances of leaving a lasting positive impression on the interviewer. Focus on your skills, experience, and how you can contribute to the company's success. Remember, a well-managed conversation is key to securing your desired position. Advanced FAQs: 1. Don't Let Your Dream Job Slip Away: Things NOT to Say at a Job Interview

Landing a job interview is a fantastic achievement. You've navigated the resume screening and the initial application hurdles. Now, it's your chance to shine, to make that personal connection, and to convince the hiring manager that you're the perfect fit. But as exciting as this opportunity is, it's also a minefield. One wrong word, one ill-timed comment, and your carefully crafted image can crumble. As a professional content writer who's seen and heard it all (or at least a good chunk of it), I'm here to guide you through the treacherous waters of job interview conversations. We're going to explore the common pitfalls, the phrases that make interviewers cringe, and the underlying reasons why they're so detrimental. Think of this as your essential "interview etiquette" guide, focusing on what not to do, so you can confidently focus on what to do. Let's dive in and ensure you walk out of that interview feeling great, not regretting a single word.

The "What Ifs" and "Maybes": Showing a Lack of Confidence

First impressions matter, and your confidence (or lack thereof) is a huge part of that. Avoid statements that betray uncertainty about your abilities or your interest in the role.

"I'm not sure if I have enough experience in..."

This is a classic red flag. Instead of highlighting what you don't have, focus on your transferable skills and your eagerness to learn. Recruiters understand that no one is a perfect fit from day one. They want to see your potential and your proactive approach. *What to say instead: "While I may not have direct experience with X, I've developed strong [transferable skill] in Y and Z. I'm a quick learner and I'm confident I can get up to speed rapidly."

"I'm just looking for something to tide me over until..."

This tells the interviewer that you're not serious about this particular opportunity and that they're just a stepping stone. It screams "disloyalty" and suggests you'll be gone as soon as something better comes along. *What to say instead: Focus on the positive aspects of this role and company. Talk about how it aligns with your career goals and why you're excited about the prospect of contributing.

"I guess I can do that."

This phrase is passive and unenthusiastic. It implies a lack of genuine interest or a feeling of being forced into the task. Employers want someone who is excited and motivated by the work. * What to say instead: "I'm excited about the opportunity to [specific task] and believe my skills in [relevant area] would be a great asset."

The "Me, Me, Me" Syndrome: Being Too Self-Centered

While you need to highlight your accomplishments, an interview isn't just about you. It's about how you can benefit the company. Avoid making it sound like you're only concerned with your own needs and desires.

"What's the salary?" (Too Early and Too Direct)

Bringing up salary in the very first interview, especially before discussing the role in detail, can come across as mercenary. It suggests that money is your primary motivator, not the job itself. * What to say instead: It's perfectly acceptable to discuss salary expectations when prompted or when the conversation naturally leads there, often in later stages. If you're asked about your salary expectations early on, try to gauge the market rate and provide a range, reiterating your interest in the role itself.

"I really need this job."

While you might feel this way, expressing desperation can be a turn-off. It can make you seem like you have limited options or that you might accept any terms, potentially leading to a weaker negotiation position down the line. * What to say instead: Focus on your desire for this specific role and why you're a strong candidate. Emphasize your qualifications and enthusiasm.

"This is the only job I'm applying for."

Even if it's true, this statement can be risky. It might imply a lack of options or that you're putting all your eggs in one basket, which can create an imbalance in the negotiation. * What to say instead: You can say you're pursuing opportunities that align well with your skills and career goals, implying you're being selective and strategic.

The "Negativity Corner": Badmouthing Past Employers and Colleagues

This is arguably one of the biggest interview faux pas. Complaining about previous bosses, coworkers, or companies creates an immediate negative impression.

"My last boss was incompetent/a micromanager/etc."

No matter how true your grievances might be, airing them in an interview is unprofessional and reflects poorly on you. Interviewers will wonder if you'll speak about them the same way in the future. It suggests you might be difficult to work with or have unresolved issues. * What to say instead: Frame your past experiences in a neutral or constructive way. For example, if you had a micromanager, you could say, "I thrive in environments where I have autonomy and can take ownership of my projects, which is something I'm looking for in my next role."

"The company culture was toxic."

Similar to criticizing a boss, this is a major red flag. It can make you appear as someone who is prone to negativity or who struggles to adapt. * What to say instead: Focus on what you're looking for in a positive company culture. "I'm looking for a collaborative and supportive work environment where team members are encouraged to share ideas and learn from each other."

The "Lack of Preparation" Blunders: Showing You Didn't Do Your Homework

An interview is your chance to show you've researched the company and understand the role. Failing to do so is a missed opportunity and can make you seem uninterested.

"So, what does your company do?"

This is a golden opportunity to shoot yourself in the foot. It demonstrates a shocking lack of preparation and suggests you've just shown up without any prior knowledge. * What to say instead: Show you've done your research! "I was particularly interested in [specific project or initiative] that I read about on your website. It aligns perfectly with my interest in [relevant field]."

"I don't know much about this role."

Again, this screams unpreparedness. You should have a solid understanding of the job description and how your skills fit. * What to say instead: "Based on the job description, I understand this role involves [key responsibilities]. My experience in [relevant skill] makes me confident I can excel in these areas."

The "Over-Sharing" Zone: Unnecessary Personal Details

While it's good to be personable, an interview is a professional setting. Keep personal anecdotes and information to a minimum, especially if they're not relevant to the job.

"I'm going through a really difficult time with my [personal relationship/family issue] right now."

While empathy is important, sharing deeply personal struggles can make an interviewer uncomfortable and may lead them to question your ability to focus on work. * What to say instead: Keep your personal life separate from your professional aspirations during an interview.

"I'm not a morning person, so I hope it's okay if I'm a little groggy at first."

This is an unnecessary self-inflicted wound. It sets a negative expectation and can raise concerns about your punctuality and energy levels. * What to say instead: Be on time, alert, and ready to engage.

The "Unprofessional Inquiry" Pitfalls: Questions to Avoid Asking

Your questions at the end of an interview are your chance to show continued interest and to gather crucial information. However, some questions can backfire spectacularly.

"How soon can I get a promotion?"

While ambition is good, asking about promotions before you've even landed the job can make you seem impatient and overly focused on climbing the ladder rather than contributing to the current role. * What to say instead: Focus on learning and development. "What opportunities are there for professional development within this role?" or "How does the company support employee growth?"

"What are the biggest weaknesses of the company?"

This can come across as overly critical or as if you're looking for flaws to exploit. * What to say instead: Frame it positively. "What are the company's current strategic priorities?" or "What are the biggest opportunities for the company in the coming year?"

"Do you guys have a lot of office drama?"

This is a loaded question that can bring up negative associations. It implies you're looking for or expecting conflict. * What to say instead: Focus on team dynamics. "Could you describe the team culture and how the team collaborates?"

The "Arrogance Alert": Overconfidence and Dismissiveness

While confidence is key, arrogance is a dealbreaker. It can alienate interviewers and make you seem like a difficult person to work with.

"I'm the best person for this job, hands down."

While you should believe in your abilities, such a blunt and potentially arrogant statement can be off-putting. * What to say instead: "I'm confident that my skills and experience in [relevant areas] make me a strong candidate who can significantly contribute to your team."

"I've already done this a million times."

This can sound dismissive of the role or the interviewer's time, implying that the task is beneath you or that you have nothing new to learn. * What to say instead: "I have extensive experience in this area and I'm eager to apply my knowledge to [specific challenges of the role]."

Key Takeaways for a Successful Interview

* Preparation is paramount: Research the company, understand the role, and practice your answers. * Focus on your strengths and transferable skills: Highlight what you can do and how you can add value. * Be positive and enthusiastic: Show genuine interest in the opportunity. * Listen carefully: Pay attention to the interviewer's questions and respond thoughtfully. * Ask insightful questions: This shows your engagement and helps you assess if the role is a good fit for you. * Maintain professionalism: Keep personal details to a minimum and avoid negativity. By being mindful of these common interview mistakes, you'll significantly increase your chances of making a positive and lasting impression. Remember, an interview is a two-way street. It's your opportunity to showcase your best self and to determine if the company is the right place for you to grow and thrive. Good luck!

What Not to Say at a Job Interview: Guarding Your Professional Image

A job interview is a pivotal moment where your words carry significant weight—not just in conveying your qualifications, but in shaping the employer’s perception of your character, professionalism, and fit for the role. While it’s natural to feel nervous and want to be memorable, certain statements can unintentionally undermine your credibility and diminish your chances. Understanding what to avoid is essential for crafting a confident, respectful, and compelling presence.

One of the most common pitfalls is making negative comments about past employers or colleagues. Phrases like “My last boss was terrible” or “I left that job because the company was a mess” project instability and a lack of professionalism. Even subtle grievances can raise red flags about your emotional maturity and ability to work collaboratively. Instead, focus on constructive reflections—highlighting what you learned or how you grew from the experience, if appropriate. This demonstrates self-awareness without burning bridges.

Avoiding Over-Confidence and Arrogance

While confidence is a highly valued trait, boasting excessively or dismissing others’ contributions can come across as hubris. Saying things like “I’m the best candidate because no one else comes close” or “I’ll do all the work and they just supervise” undermines teamwork and humility—qualities employers increasingly seek. Instead, express confidence in your skills while acknowledging the value of collaboration. Phrases such as “I thrive in team environments and bring strong expertise in project execution” strike a balanced tone that reflects competence without arrogance.

Equally critical is refraining from making inappropriate personal announcements. Announcing plans like “I’m getting married next month” or “I’m moving across the country” during an interview can distract from your professional suitability. While personal life is private, sharing such details is rarely relevant and may raise questions about judgment or commitment. Keep the focus on the role, your achievements, and how you align with the company’s goals.

Steering Clear of Generic or Overused Responses

Employers hear thousands of answers to standard questions, so generic, rehearsed responses can make you blend into the crowd. Saying “I’m a hard worker” without context feels hollow; instead, illustrate your work ethic through specific examples—such as a time you exceeded deadlines or took initiative under pressure. This not only shows authenticity but also helps interviewers visualize your contributions. Similarly, avoid clichés like “I work hard” or “I’m a team player” without backing them up with real-world evidence.

Another misstep is answering questions with defensiveness or avoidance. Statements like “I don’t know that” when pressed, or “That’s not part of my experience” without offering alternatives, signal a lack of adaptability or preparation. Even when unsure, a thoughtful “I haven’t encountered that exactly, but I’ve developed strong problem-solving skills that would help me learn quickly” conveys resilience and a growth mindset—traits highly prized in dynamic workplaces.

The Long-Term Impact of Thoughtful Communication

What you say during an interview influences not only immediate impressions but also long-term professional relationships. A polished, respectful tone fosters trust and opens doors for future opportunities, even if you don't secure the role today. Conversely, careless remarks can tarnish your reputation, especially in tight-knit industries where word travels fast. By choosing your words carefully, you position yourself as thoughtful, self-aware, and aligned with organizational culture.

Looking ahead, as remote and virtual interviews become standard, the importance of verbal precision and emotional intelligence grows even more. Online platforms demand clear, composed communication—every word counts in building credibility without physical presence. Mastering what not to say is therefore not just about avoiding mistakes, but about proactively shaping a professional identity that stands out in a competitive landscape.

Mastering the Art of Interview Communication

In essence, navigating a job interview with wisdom means balancing confidence with humility, preparation with authenticity, and clarity with respect. By consciously avoiding statements that project negativity, arrogance, or irrelevance, you craft a narrative that resonates deeply with hiring managers. These thoughtful choices not only enhance your immediate interview performance but lay a foundation for lasting professional credibility—key to thriving in today's demanding and evolving workplace environment.

Things Not to Say at a Job Interview: Avoiding the Pitfalls That Cost You the Offer

A job interview is your golden opportunity to impress a potential employer, showcasing your skills, experience, and suitability for the role. However, even the most qualified candidates can sabotage their chances with a single ill-chosen phrase or a careless comment. As a professional journalist, I've seen countless hiring managers recount stories of promising candidates who faltered due to what they said—or perhaps more importantly, what they shouldn't have said. This in-depth guide will equip you with the knowledge to navigate the interview minefield and avoid the common conversational missteps that can cost you your dream job. Understanding these interview faux pas is crucial for anyone aiming to secure a new career opportunity.

The adage "think before you speak" is never more relevant than during a job interview. Recruiters and hiring managers are not just assessing your resume; they are evaluating your personality, your professionalism, and your alignment with the company culture. Your words carry significant weight, revealing your attitude, your understanding of the role, and your overall approach to problem-solving and teamwork. Mastering interview etiquette, including knowing what not to say in a job interview, is as vital as preparing your resume or researching the company.

The Classic Blunders: Common Interview Mistakes

Some mistakes are so pervasive, they've become almost cliché. Recognizing and avoiding these evergreen pitfalls is the first step to interview success. These common interview blunders can be easily sidestepped with mindful preparation.

"I don't have any weaknesses." / "My only weakness is that I'm a perfectionist."

This is perhaps the most overused and least convincing answer to the classic "What are your weaknesses?" question. Interviewers are not looking for someone who is flawless. They are looking for self-awareness and a commitment to personal and professional growth. A response that suggests you have no flaws can come across as arrogant or out of touch. Similarly, the "perfectionist" answer is often seen as a disguised strength, lacking genuine introspection. A better approach is to identify a genuine, albeit manageable, weakness and explain how you are actively working to improve it. For example, you might say, "In the past, I've sometimes struggled with delegating tasks effectively, as I wanted to ensure everything was done just right. However, I've learned the importance of empowering my team and have been actively practicing strategic delegation, which has not only improved efficiency but also fostered greater team development." This demonstrates honesty and a proactive mindset.

"I don't know." (Without further elaboration)

While honesty is valued, a blunt "I don't know" to a question about your skills or experience can be a red flag. It suggests a lack of preparation or a willingness to admit ignorance without attempting to find a solution. If you genuinely don't know the answer to a technical question, it's better to say something like, "That's a great question. While I haven't encountered that specific scenario before, my approach would be to first consult our internal documentation, then reach out to a subject matter expert on the team to ensure I understand the best practices. I'm always eager to learn and adapt to new challenges." This shows your problem-solving skills and your commitment to acquiring knowledge. For behavioral questions, you might say, "I haven't personally experienced that exact situation, but I can draw on a similar challenge where..." This demonstrates your ability to transfer learning.

Complaining about Previous Employers or Colleagues

This is a cardinal sin in job interviews. No matter how terrible your previous work environment was, badmouthing former bosses, colleagues, or the company itself will reflect poorly on you. It can make the interviewer wonder if you'll be a difficult employee or a gossip. Instead of negativity, focus on the positive aspects of your desire for a new role. Phrases like, "I'm looking for a role that offers more opportunities for X," or "I'm seeking a company culture that values Y," are much more constructive. Frame your departure as a quest for growth and alignment, not an escape from toxicity. This is a critical point for maintaining a positive professional reputation.

"What exactly do you do here?" / "What is this company about?"

Failing to research the company before an interview is a sign of disrespect and a lack of genuine interest. Asking fundamental questions about the business shows you haven't done your homework. Before any interview, thoroughly research the company's mission, values, products/services, recent news, and its position in the industry. You can then leverage this knowledge to ask insightful questions about challenges, opportunities, or strategic directions, demonstrating your engagement and foresight.

Digging Your Own Grave: More Subtle Yet Damaging Statements

Beyond the obvious gaffes, there are subtler remarks that can undermine your candidacy, often stemming from a lack of social awareness or an unintended negative implication. Being mindful of these less obvious interview blunders is key.

"Is this job permanent?" / Focusing excessively on salary and benefits early on

While it's natural to be concerned about job security and compensation, bringing up these topics too early, especially before the interviewer has had a chance to assess your fit, can signal that your primary motivation is not the role itself but the perks. Wait until the later stages of the interview process, or until the interviewer brings up the topic, to discuss salary expectations and benefits. Focus first on demonstrating your value and enthusiasm for the position.

"I'm not sure if I'm qualified for this." / Sounding hesitant about your abilities

You were invited to interview for a reason! Don't undermine your own candidacy by expressing doubt about your qualifications. If you feel there's a specific skill gap, address it constructively by highlighting transferable skills or your eagerness to learn. For instance, instead of saying "I'm not sure I have enough experience with X," you could say, "While my direct experience with X is developing, I have a strong foundation in Y and Z, which are highly transferable, and I am a quick learner, eager to master X." Confidence, not arrogance, is key.

"I need this job." / Expressing desperation

This can put immense pressure on both you and the interviewer. It can also signal that you might accept any offer, regardless of fit, or that you are in a precarious situation. Frame your interest in terms of mutual benefit: how you can contribute to the company and how the role aligns with your career goals. Focus on your enthusiasm and the value you bring, rather than your personal need.

Asking "What do you dislike about working here?"

This question, while perhaps intended to gauge realism, is almost always a bad idea. It's a negative framing that invites negativity. Instead, ask about challenges the team faces, opportunities for growth, or the biggest priorities for the role in the next six months. This approach is more constructive and forward-looking.

"My previous manager was terrible." / Any negative comments about former colleagues or management

As mentioned earlier, this is a major red flag. It suggests you might be a difficult employee, prone to complaining, or unable to navigate interpersonal dynamics. Always maintain a professional demeanor and avoid airing grievances. The focus should always be on your positive attributes and aspirations.

"I don't have any questions."

This is a missed opportunity to demonstrate your engagement and curiosity. Failing to ask questions can signal a lack of interest or preparation. Prepare a list of thoughtful questions related to the role, the team, the company culture, and future opportunities. Examples include: "What are the biggest challenges facing the team right now?" or "How does the company support professional development for its employees?" or "What does success look like in this role after the first 90 days?"

The Unspoken Rules: Nuances of Interview Communication

Beyond specific phrases, there are broader communication styles and assumptions that can lead to misinterpretations. Understanding these nuances is crucial for a polished interview performance.

Over-sharing Personal Information

While building rapport is good, avoid oversharing intimate details about your personal life, health issues, or financial struggles. Keep the conversation focused on your professional capabilities and how they align with the job requirements. Maintain professional boundaries.

Dominating the Conversation / Not Listening

An interview is a dialogue, not a monologue. Give the interviewer ample opportunity to speak, ask questions, and steer the conversation. Interrupting or speaking incessantly can be perceived as rude and egocentric. Practice active listening by nodding, making eye contact, and responding thoughtfully to the interviewer's points.

Making Assumptions about the Role or Company

Don't assume you know everything about the job or the company. Ask clarifying questions. For example, if you're unsure about a specific responsibility, ask, "Could you elaborate on what that entails?" This shows you are detail-oriented and seek clarity.

Using Slang, Jargon (unless appropriate for the industry), or Profanity

Maintain a professional tone and vocabulary. Avoid slang, overly casual language, or any form of profanity. While industry-specific jargon might be acceptable in some contexts, ensure you're not alienating the interviewer if they are not as familiar with it.

Expressing a Lack of Enthusiasm or Interest

Your body language and tone of voice are as important as your words. A lack of energy, slumped posture, or monotone voice can convey disinterest. Show genuine enthusiasm for the role and the company. Smile, maintain eye contact, and speak with confidence and conviction.

The Takeaway: Polished Communication for Career Advancement

Ultimately, the key to navigating a job interview successfully lies in preparation, self-awareness, and a commitment to professional communication. By understanding and avoiding the common pitfalls—what not to say in a job interview—you can present yourself as a confident, competent, and desirable candidate. Remember that every word you utter is an opportunity to build a positive impression. Focus on showcasing your value, your problem-solving abilities, your positive attitude, and your genuine interest in the role and the organization. A well-prepared candidate who communicates thoughtfully and professionally significantly increases their chances of landing the job.

Questions & Answers About things not to say at a job interview

No	Question	Answer
1	What's the biggest faux pas someone can make during a job interview?	The biggest faux pas is usually badmouthing a previous employer or colleagues. It paints you as negative and unprofessional, and interviewers wonder if you'll speak poorly of them next.
2	Is it okay to admit you don't know something during an interview?	Yes, it's far better to admit you don't know something than to bluff or lie. Instead, follow up with how you'd approach finding the answer or your willingness to learn.
3	What if I ask about salary too early? Is that a red flag?	Asking about salary too early, especially in the first interview, can make it seem like your primary motivation is money, not the role itself. Wait until later in the process or until the interviewer brings it up.
4	Should I ever say 'I need this job'?	Avoid saying 'I need this job.' It can convey desperation rather than genuine interest and confidence. Focus on why you're a good fit for this specific role and this company.
5	What's a common mistake regarding explaining gaps in employment?	A common mistake is being evasive or vague about employment gaps. Be honest and concise, focusing on what you learned or did during that time, such as skill development, personal projects, or family responsibilities.
6	Is it a good idea to say 'I don't have any questions' at the end?	Never say you have no questions! It shows a lack of engagement and initiative. Always prepare a few thoughtful questions about the role, team, company culture, or future opportunities.
7	What should I avoid saying about my weaknesses?	Don't list a cliché 'weakness' that's actually a strength in disguise (e.g., 'I'm a perfectionist'). Instead, choose a genuine, manageable weakness and explain how you're actively working to improve it.
8	Is it a problem to seem overly familiar or casual with the interviewer?	Yes, being overly casual can be perceived as a lack of respect for the professional setting. Maintain a balance of professionalism and approachability, avoiding slang or overly personal anecdotes.
9	What's a surefire way to sound unprepared?	Asking basic questions that are easily found on the company website is a surefire way to sound unprepared. Do your research beforehand so your questions demonstrate deeper interest and understanding.

avoid jargon in interviews, never talk about salary too early, don't criticize past employers carelessly, don't boast about personal achievements, avoid discussing unrelated hobbies too much, never mention family issues or health problems, don't gossip about colleagues or company culture, stay away from negative talk about previous roles, avoid speculating on future job changes prematurely, don't use informal language or slang
